He's ba-a-a-ck

Retired Adm. Bobby Inman is as popular among hard-core intelligence types as, say, Count Dracula. In fact, some were seen yesterday looking for a stake and a mallet to put to rest the liberal, anti-~~communist~~ ~~former~~ former deputy CIA director's influence.

The admiral was in town recently sewing up the appointments of two of his proteges for key slots in the intelligence community. Bill Working — described by one hard-liner as a "green eye-shade office weenie" — is said to be in line to be director of intelligence for the National Security Council staff. And Doug Mulholland — who formerly headed intelligence for the Treasury Department under Jim Baker and was described as having "stacked arms 10 years ago" — is heading the list to run the State Department's bureau of intelligence and research.

"The agency guys are appalled," said one caller, referring to intelligence professionals at the CIA.
